

About the author of this book:

ANNE TERRY WHITE's classmates, back in her New England high school days, voted her both the best girl student and the most ambitious. But her ambitions have been all for scholarship. Graduated from Brown University in 1918, where she was elected to Phi Beta Kappa, she entered at once on a wider course of study which neither marriage in her senior year nor various positions as teacher and social worker interrupted. In 1925 she received a Master's Degree in English from Stanford University. It was for the sake of giving the Bible and Shakespeare to her own two daughters at an early age that she wrote Heroes of the Five Books and Three Children and Shakespeare. But she is best known to book lovers for her Men Before Adam, an anthropology for the general reader, and her notable Lost Worlds. This book, published more than a decade ago, is still rated as one of the finest books on archaeology ever published. It has been translated into eight languages. Mrs. White is also the author of Prehistoric America in the Landmark Series.

About the illustrator of this book:

DOUGLAS GORSLINE is a well-known artist, etcher and illustrator, whose work has been exhibited in important national exhibitions such as the Whitney Museum, Chicago Art Institute, Carnegie International, Metropolitan Museum, and the Pennsylvania Academy. He is a member of the National Academy of Design, and the American Society of Graphic Artists. Both in painting and etching he has received numerous national awards.